Necessity for Sweden to surrender something--Obstinacy of Charles --Rejects the mediation of England--And the offer of the alliance of Prussia--Movements of Stenbock after Gadebusch-- The burning of Altona--Surrender of the Swedes at Toning-- Last sufferings and death of Stenbock--Desperate position of Sweden--Finland lost--Stettin occupied--Charles refuses the mediation of Louis XIV.--Despair of the Swedish Senate--A Riksdag summoned--Condition of the finances--Dissatisfaction of the Estates--Their revolutionary projects--Ambiguous conduct of the Princess Ulrica--Energetic intervention of Chancellor Horn--Return of Charles XII.--Enthusiasm in Sweden-- Fresh complications--Prussia and Hanover declare war against Charles--The siege of Stralsund--Engagement of Stresow-- Fruitless heroism of the King-- Fall of Stralsund. [I]E battle of Gadebusch materially improved the position of Sweden, at least for a time, and indeed during the whole course of 1712 she had several opportunities of coming to terms with her numerous foes on relatively favourable conditions, considering her really desperate position. But by this time it had become evident to her wisest and most patriotic statesmen that something must be sacrificed. After a century of almost unbroken triumphs and conquests, Sweden found herself face to face with the painful necessity of surrendering part of her dominions in order to save the rest. She had to choose between an indispensable peace that could only be purchased by a cession of territory, and a ruinous war with the prospect of still greater losses. It was manifestly impossible that...
